Legislative Petitions Gave Voice to Virginians

AN EXHIBITION OPEN THROUGH NOVEMBER 19, 2022
25th-Anniversary Celebration

The Literary Awards gala returns to the Library this fall

This year marks the 25th anniversary of the Library of Virginia’s Literary Awards program honoring Virginia writers and their contributions to the literary landscape of our state and nation. The Library launched the program in 1997 following the move to our current building, which offers wonderful public spaces for events highlighting the work of Virginia writers.

The winners of the Literary Awards in fiction, nonfiction, and poetry are revealed each fall at a celebration gala held in the Library’s grand atrium. It has been exciting over the past 25 years to see this event evolve from a fledgling idea into a not-to-be-missed tradition.

In 2013 the Library joined with the Virginia Museum of Fine Arts (VMFA) to create Art in Literature: The Mary Lynn Kotz Award for the best book in any genre focused on the visual arts. The Art in Literature award winner is the featured speaker at a special program held at the VMFA the evening before the main Literary Awards celebration.

Regular attendees of the Literary Awards gala have experienced many unforgettable moments in the past 25 years and met writers whose work has enriched their lives and the lives of millions around the world—David Baldacci, John Grisham, William Styron, Tom Wolfe, Jan Karon, Barbara Kingsolver, Earl Hamner, and many more. They have been entranced by astoundingly gifted poets like Claudia Emerson, Rita Dove, Charles Wright, and Nikki Giovanni as they shared their craft and their genius. They have cheered as best-selling authors such as Margo Shetterly and Beth Macy, who have opened our eyes to hitherto hidden stories, paid tribute to libraries such as ours for making their pathbreaking works possible. Audiences smiled with joy when poet Lou Crabtree broke into song in accepting her award, and listened with awe as Lisa Russ Spaar delivered an eloquent tribute to Virginia poets using a carefully selected line from every nominated work of poetry.

The incomparable Adriana Trigiani, who has hosted the Literary Awards ceremony for the past 18 years, once reflected on why the awards are so special. “The Literary Awards are a celebration of Virginia’s talent, determination, and vision,” she stated. “Virginia authors are a special breed of talent. We are inspired by the most beautiful landscapes, intriguing stories, and sharply drawn characters that could only thrive in the place we call home.”

After two years as a virtual experience, the 25th annual Literary Awards Celebration will be held in person again this October. Please mark your calendar for Saturday, October 15, 2022, and make plans to meet this year’s honorees and help us launch this wonderful event into its second quarter century.

Ticket information and the list of finalists for the 2022 awards will be announced in July. For information about nominated works or to nominate a book for next year’s awards, please visit www.lva.virginia.gov/public/litawards.

Sincerely,

Sandra G. Treadway, Librarian of Virginia

Legislative Petitions Gave Voice to Virginians

Explore the personal stories contained within a unique collection

BY BARBARA C. BATSON

Your Humble Petitioner, a free exhibition at the Library of Virginia running through November 19, 2022, reveals the poignant stories of Virginians from all walks of life that can be found in the Library’s Legislative Petitions Collection. The collection contains a gold mine of historical information not available anywhere else.

Have you ever signed a petition? Today, we’re familiar with signing petitions to voice concerns over topics such as redistricting or traffic control or any number of issues. But did you know that it’s an ancient right—one that’s enshrined in the First Amendment to the United States Constitution? Imagine having to explain to the House of Delegates why you want to divorce your spouse, change your name, or take other actions that affect your life. Virginians had to do just that for nearly a century. Your Humble Petitioner highlights petitions that

WAR STORY
This October 11, 1776, petition seeks financial aid for Norfolk resident Mary Webley, whose leg was broken by a cannonball fired from a British warship in 1776. Her family was already struggling because her husband was unable to work after losing an arm years before the war. The petition was successful and she received £10, or about $2,100 today. Detail from The Burning of Norfolk illustration, ca. 1880, artist unknown, from Cassell’s History of the United States.
involved deeply personal issues such as divorce and requests by emancipated Black people to remain in the commonwealth, offering a glimpse into the realities of 18th- and 19th-century life.

The Legislative Petitions Collection at the Library of Virginia numbers approximately 25,000 petitions submitted to the General Assembly between 1776 and 1865, some presented by groups, but many more submitted by individuals. During the years between the American Revolution and the Civil War, Virginians submitted petitions to the General Assembly to bring local or personal issues to the attention of their legislators. The collection reveals how Virginians communicated their concerns on a wide range of topics, offering insights into popular opinion on matters both public and private. To obtain legal permission to operate a ferry, maintain a tavern, or stop hogs from running loose through a town, residents of the commonwealth were required to submit a petition into the House of Delegates to begin the process of acceptance or rejection. The right to petition was not restricted by class, race, or sex. Although they could not vote, women and Black Virginians, both enslaved and free, could petition the General Assembly.

The exhibition includes the story of James Lafayette (PICTURED ON THE COVER), who was enslaved in New Kent County but became a spy during the American Revolution, serving under the Marquis de Lafayette. In 1786, he successfully petitioned the General Assembly for his freedom. His petition describes his service: “That during the

Another featured petition shares the story of Norfolk resident Mary Webley, whose leg was broken by a cannonball fired from a British warship in 1776. She and her family were already struggling because her husband was unable to work after losing an arm years before the war. Webley’s petition to the General Assembly for aid described her situation: “She hath at present no Ways or Means to procure Shelter or acquire Subsistence for herself and miserable little children, her Husband and Self having had all their effects totally destroyed in the Flames of Norfolk.”

“We can relate to these petitions because they are deeply personal and often heartbreaking,” said Gregg Kimball, the Library’s director of Public Services and Outreach. “But they also brightly illuminate the big issues of the time such as the constraints on freedom, religious intolerance, and the relationship of citizens to the State. This combination makes them remarkable teaching tools.”

What was the process for petitioning the General Assembly? The petitioner submitted a petition to a delegate who then presented and read the petition to the House of Delegates. If not immediately rejected, the petition was referred to a committee who would recommend an action. If the committee deemed the petition acceptable, the delegates drew up a bill that had to pass three readings. In the first reading, the bill was accepted or rejected. At the second reading, delegates debated and amended the bill. If the bill passed the third reading, it then was sent to the Senate for approval or rejection. Both houses had to approve the bill for it to become law. The clerk of the House of Delegates endorsed the petition at each step until its final endorsement of accepted or rejected.

THE COST OF BUSINESS
Conjoined twins known as Chang and Eng (1811–1874) traveled as entertainers and staged their show in venues in Virginia with an admission fee of twenty-five cents. In March 1832, they submitted a petition (shown at left) to protest the imposition of a license on their traveling show with a fee of thirty dollars at every locality. The House of Delegates referred the petition to the Committee on Finance, which considered the brothers’ request “reasonable.” A majority of the delegates disagreed, however, because any change in the law required a floor vote, and the petition was rejected. Petitions to the General Assembly were the primary catalyst for legislation in the commonwealth from 1776 until 1865. This workshop will explore how citizens interacted with the General Assembly through 1865. Ginny Dunn (Archives and Library Reference Services manager) and Dawn Tinnell (senior reference archivist) will discuss how you can mine legislative petitions to get a fuller picture of the lives of your ancestors. They will also provide guidance on how to search the Library’s Legislative Petitions Digital Collection and published resources. A tour of the Library and the exhibition will follow the workshop. A CONVERSATION WITH WARREN EUGENE MILTEER JR.
Beyond Slavery’s Shadow: Free People of Color in the South
Thursday, June 9, 2022 | 6:00–7:30 PM | Lecture Hall | Free

Please join us in person for a conversation with historian and author Warren Eugene Milteer Jr. on his new book, Beyond Slavery’s Shadow: Free People of Color in the South, with Gregg Kimball, the Library of Virginia’s director of Public Services and Outreach, and Vincent Brooks, senior local records archivist. On the eve of the Civil War, most people of color in the United States toiled in bondage. Yet nearly half a million of these individuals, including over 250,000 in the South, were free. In Beyond Slavery’s Shadow, Milteer draws from a wide array of sources to demonstrate that from the colonial period through the Civil War, the growing influence of white supremacy and proslavery extremism created serious challenges for free persons living in the South. Nevertheless, in the face of attempts to deny them the most basic privileges and rights, free people of color defended their families and established organizations and businesses. Milteer used the Library’s Local Records Collection in his research for the book. A book signing will follow the talk. For more information, contact Ashley Ramey Craig at ashley.ramey@lva.virginia.gov or 804.692.3001.

REQUESTING TO REMAIN IN VIRGINIA
A formerly enslaved woman named Nancy fell under the mandate of an 1806 law that required freed people to leave the state within one year. On December 6, 1815, in Loudoun County, she petitioned for permission to remain in Virginia with her three children. Although the House found the request to be “reasonable,” no bill was presented to allow Nancy to remain in Virginia. Illustration by David Hunter Strother.

In observance of Black History Month in February, the Library of Virginia and Dominion Energy honored five distinguished Virginians as the 2022 Strong Men & Women in Virginia History for their contributions to the commonwealth and the nation. Each generation of African Americans has built on the achievements of those who came before to lead the way to the future. The men and women featured here offer powerful examples of individuals who refused to be defined by their circumstances. Through education and advocacy, they demonstrate how African Americans have actively campaigned for better lives for themselves and their people. Biographies of honorees are displayed in an exhibition at the Library; featured on materials sent to schools, libraries, and museums across Virginia; and included on an educational website for teachers and students (www.lva.virginia.gov/smw). Further information about distinguished African Americans from Virginia can be found in the Dictionary of Virginia Biography (Library of Virginia, 1998–2006).

NOMINATIONS SOUGHT!
Is there an African American man or woman in your community who has made a positive difference in your region, the state, or the nation? If you’re an educator, encourage your students to research and nominate someone for the 2023 slate of honorees for Strong Men & Women in Virginia History. Schools with winning nominations are eligible for cash prizes, free teacher workshops, and student programming. Members of the public are also encouraged to submit nominations but are not eligible for prizes. The deadline for submissions is June 19, 2022. Nominees can be either living or dead. Go to www.lva.virginia.gov/smw to learn more about the process and to see a list of previous honorees.

A grandfather’s World War I portrait inspires historical fiction

Writer Barbara Diggs discovered the World War I portrait of her maternal grandfather, James Morton Moss, as well as his answers to a postwar questionnaire through the Library of Virginia’s online exhibition True Sons of Freedom (truesons.virginiamemory.com). The exhibition features photographs of African American soldiers from Virginia who fought overseas to defend freedoms they were denied at home. Part of the World War I History Commission Collection, the images were submitted by the veterans themselves with their responses to military service questionnaires created by the Virginia War History Commission in order to capture the scope of Virginians’ participation in the war. This find inspired Diggs to create the short fiction piece shown below, Granddaddy at War, originally published as a “historical flash” in the online journal FlashBack Fiction (flashbackfiction.com).

My grandfather stands straight as the rifle he won’t be allowed to touch. Trenches may be choked with corpses across the ocean, but a weapon in the hands of a Black man is no less disruptive to world order. Better for him not to know the sleek feel of power, become intoxicated by its kick and heft. In the battle for democracy, he is best armed with a shovel.

Never mind. My grandfather is perfectly willing to do whatever he can for his country. He is surprised to realize that he believes in the elusive promise of America; feels bound to the old red, white, and blue. Ever since the declaration of war, he has heard a faint crackling in the air, as if someone was burning stubble down the road. He’d pause in his tobacco field, sickle in mid-swing, to let the sound run through him. He likes the fire it sets in his blood, the way it fractures his vision. It’s the sound of the world breaking open, he tells my grandmother later, after walking the thirty miles to Petersburg to enlist. Look here: Already they have given him this fine olive uniform, taught him to wrap his puttees smartly. Already they have promised to photograph him against a backdrop of grandeur. My grandmother turns away, catching her words between her teeth. But he reads them in the stiff line of her back: You really think they gonna let you be a man?

The sharp-jawed military photographer tells my grandfather to turn slightly and stand still. My grandfather does so. A shadow of distaste on the photographer’s face bares its teeth at my grandfather but today it cannot touch him. My grandfather folds his arms and looks steadily into the camera lens as if staring down a rifle barrel. The crackling sounds; he knows this is his chance.

He will show the photographer. He will show the Germans. He will show everyone.

—Barbara Diggs

Barbara Diggs's fiction has appeared in numerous publications, including Lunate Fiction, Ellipsis Zine, Reflex Fiction, and Spelk, and was shortlisted for the 2021 Bath Flash Fiction Award.
THE BACKSTORY

For many African Americans, much of our ancestral history is lost to time and circumstances. So we celebrate whenever a piece of the puzzle comes together. Back in 2018, my brother Keith realized how little he knew of our maternal grandfather, James Morton Moss. Granddaddy, born in 1887 in Brunswick County, Virginia, died when my brother was small and before I was born. We have few pictures of him. In fact, I only recall one: him, a rather worn-looking and bespectacled 66-year-old, standing solemnly at my mother’s side at her wedding.

On a whim, Keith searched Granddaddy’s name on the internet. To his astonishment, he found himself on the Library of Virginia website, staring at an unfamiliar photo of a young Granddaddy in military uniform—handsome, confident, proud, determined. We’d known he had served in World War I, but not much more.

My brother contacted Barbara Batson, exhibitions coordinator at the Library, who informed him that the Library also had a postwar questionnaire Granddaddy had completed describing his experiences. We were stunned by this time-blurring document. Here was the voice of our grandfather, extending across a century to tell his story.

As a writer of history and fiction, I couldn’t stop pondering all that was untold. I was particularly struck by one of his questionnaire responses: “I was perfectly willing to do anything I could for my country.” Knowing he lived under Jim Crow, knowing the soul-crushing humiliations he must have endured, I could only marvel at this statement. What faith he had in our country! This is the kernel of my short fiction piece about my grandfather—his apparent hope, his optimism against the backdrop of a dreadful reality.

I’m grateful to the Library for preserving and sharing this slice of our history, and allowing my young grandfather to continue to live and shine and speak.

—Barbara Diggs

Serendipitous connections between historic materials sometimes influence our acquisitions choices at here at the Library of Virginia. This was the case with two recently acquired items related to Richmond’s infamous Civil War prison, Libby Prison, which housed Union prisoners of war in overcrowded conditions in a former tobacco factory. In October 2020, the Library purchased a sketch drawn by Thomas E. Rose, colonel of the 77th Pennsylvania Infantry, depicting Libby Prison on February 9, 1864, the day Rose led 108 other imprisoned Union officers in a daring escape from their confinement (though Rose was recaptured). He drew the diagram for George E. Albee, who had been imprisoned at Libby Prison in August 1864. Although the diagram is undated, it appeared to have been made between 1889 and 1899, when the prison was torn down and reconstructed in Chicago as the Libby Prison War Museum.

The sketch was conserved here at the Library and digitized. While researching Rose during the cataloging process, a Library staff member discovered an item in a dealer’s catalog listed as an 1894 letter from Thomas E. Rose discussing the Libby Prison sketch and written to someone he addresses as “dear Allen.” The Library acquired the letter in November 2021. In it, Rose mentions “[t]his sketch I send you” and discusses the reconstructed Libby Prison in Chicago as well as the Libby Prison breakout. It seemed unlikely that Rose would draw two diagrams, and a closer look at the letter revealed that “Allen” was actually “Albee,” the same Albee for whom Rose had drawn the diagram now in the Library’s collection. The diagram and letter have now been reunited as the Thomas E. Rose letter and sketch of Libby Prison, February 15, 1894 (Accessions 53170 and 53463).

Dr. Lynn Rainville and Baron Schwartz have been longtime advocates and supporters of the Library of Virginia’s role as a trusted educational resource for students, researchers, and the public. They believe in the transformative nature of learning and being grounded in one’s community history and sense of homeplace. Lynn is particularly enthusiastic about the Library’s mission to help millions of people around the world understand and engage with Virginia’s complex past on a national and local level.

As a public historian and higher education leader, Lynn has dedicated more than 20 years to researching ordinary Virginians doing extraordinary things in the past. She credits the Library’s unique collections as an invaluable resource. “The Library is unrivaled in the scale and diversity of historic items related to Virginia’s history and culture,” said Lynn. “Its rich archive has helped academics discover new perspectives, and genealogists identify family connections.”

Lynn and Baron also appreciate the Library’s statewide presence. “We are lucky to live in a commonwealth with one of the best state libraries and archives in the nation,” she said. “Even though we live in the Valley, we are able to access an abundance of online resources and livestreamed programming.”

We hope you will join Lynn and Baron in their support of the Library of Virginia. It’s easier than ever to make an annual gift or commit to monthly installments. Make your contribution online at www.lva.virginia.gov/donate or by calling 804.692.3592.

Rachel Stephens

An associate professor of art history at the University of Alabama, Rachel Stephens is working on a project about white artists of the Civil War and postwar period in Richmond and their contribution to the visualizing of the “Lost Cause” in the decades following the war. She believes these artists and their circles were responding in part to Emancipation celebrations staged by African Americans immediately after the Union took Richmond.

What is one of the most notable things you’ve found in your research here at the Library?

RS: I came here hoping to establish the existence of a network of white artists in Richmond during and after the Civil War. I assumed many of them, such as William Ludwell Sheppard, John Adams Elder, and Edward Valentine, knew each other. What I found not only confirmed this, but underscored the idea that they were operating within significant structures of power in Richmond. Whether it was through memberships in clubs and civic organizations or through personal acquaintance with politicians and white “elites,” the artists not only used their work to advance white supremacist notions, but they were integral to advancing the Lost Cause myth. Everything I found at the Library confirmed these ideas. This extended from newspaper articles, to club minutes, to correspondence between artists. Particularly extraordinary were items such as William Ludwell Sheppard’s diaries and sketches and Moses Ezekiel’s correspondence. Perhaps my favorite find, though, was the State Art Collection. The artists’ works were purchased and collected at the state level, which reveals so clearly how intimately their ideologies merged with those at the state level.

What will you remember about your time here?

RS: Every staff member of the Library was extremely helpful and generous. This extended from the comfortable office I got to use to the expedient nature of receiving requested items. Every week staff members gathered to discuss the Fellows’ progress on their projects during Tuesday lunches. I came away amazed not only at the knowledge of the staff, but of their willingness to share their time so generously. Thanks especially to editor Mari Julienne for watching out for me in every step of this Fellowship!
Meredith Henne Baker

Author and independent scholar Meredith Henne Baker is currently developing a book project entitled Scenic Sisters: How Virginia’s Garden Club Women Changed a State. Her research is also contributing to a statewide multisite commemoration of the 90th anniversary of Black women’s garden clubs in Virginia in 2022.

What is one of the most notable things you’ve found in your research here at the Library?

MHB: I’m uncovering how Virginia’s gardening women shaped the state in important ways that we haven’t previously recognized. The Library of Virginia hadn’t yet completed digitizing the Southern Workman, the monthly journal of the Hampton Normal and Agricultural Institute (now Hampton University), which meant that I had to go through back issues the old-fashioned way—one page at a time! In journals from 1939 I uncovered two significant articles. The first was a report about the success of Black women’s garden clubs in Virginia. It gave concrete evidence of the changes clubs had made not only to Virginia’s physical landscape, but to the commonwealth’s cultural landscape. These groups intentionally forged interracial partnerships with white women’s garden clubs to undermine Jim Crow and improve their neighborhoods. The second article was a deeply personal profile of Asa Sims, a Hampton horticulturalist and nursery owner. The Negro Garden Clubs of Virginia were his passion, and for decades he nurtured club growth as carefully as he did his greenhouse cuttings. The writer describes Sims’s mannerisms, whimsical teaching style, and ability to transform garden discards into beautiful arrangements. For a writer, finding this level of detail about a subject is archival gold.

What will you remember about your time here?

MHB: Working with staff members who are essentially walking libraries themselves was such a rich experience. Besides the perk of casually popping into staff offices to talk shop, the Fellows had a weekly meetup with Library staff to share research findings, bounce ideas around, and ask questions. After so many of us had been working solo through the last pandemic year, being part of a learning community was energizing.

I also treasure the ways I’m seeing history repeat itself. In 2022, gardening women will again gather to create something amazing and honor their own by commemorating the 90th anniversary of the Negro Garden Club of Virginia (later the Virginia State Federated Garden Clubs) in events hosted across the commonwealth.
Rita Dove’s latest book offers a Playlist for the Apocalypse

In honor of April as Poetry Month, we’re spotlighting Pulitzer Prize winner and former U.S. Poet Laureate and Virginia Poet Laureate Rita Dove, who will read from her latest book, Playlist for the Apocalypse, in a free Weinstein Author Series talk at the Library on Thursday, July 28, 2022, at 6:00 pm. Dove, who lives in Charlottesville and teaches creative writing at the University of Virginia, received the Library of Virginia Literary Award for Poetry in 2017, as well as our Literary Lifetime Achievement Award in 2008. Here she shares one of the poems from her new book and answers questions about her work.

Can you tell us about the origin of the title of your latest book, Playlist for the Apocalypse?

Rita Dove: Well, the obvious inspiration—if one can call it that—for the title was the pandemic. COVID-19 had just begun to take us all captive when I was refining this book, and we entered a kind of dystopian universe, veering towards a potential apocalypse; there was a distinct “before and after” taking hold of our minds. But the word apocalypse also means revelation, that which is revealed—any new and sudden knowledge which can change our perception of the world. Such change can be physical, as in war or disease, but it also could mean some discovery about yourself or your spirit, your culture, or your relationships. Change can be devastating or transformative—“What doesn’t kill you makes you stronger.” So, as I hunkered down like the rest of the world and sheltered in place, I began thinking of the poems in the book less as my creations and more as my companions.

This collection of poems draws from the past and the present. How does history inspire your creative process?

RD: What establishes itself as history depends on who’s writing it. Those relegated to the sidelines feel the dichotomy between the Real and the Proclaimed acutely; ideally, they become adept at navigating these layered realities. The great African American intellectual W. E. B. Du Bois called it “double consciousness.” Both race and gender have afforded me this binocular vision; I can’t help but see history from multiple points of view. Now, thanks to television and social media, we all can witness what’s happening on the world stage pretty much instantaneously; but even though we’re being told that the news is important, whatever is happening in our own life at that moment is also significant—to us, within our narrower boundaries. This is the juncture where my poetry enters; I’m fascinated to see what sparks fly when intimate human moments are juxtaposed against grand historical panoramas.

I have a quote above my desk by Percy Bysshe Shelley, the great English Romantic poet: “Poets are the unacknowledged legislators of the race.” What I think he means by that declaration—what I take from it as sustenance—is that poets act as both mirrors and lenses for society. By observing the world closely, poets hold a mirror up to the society in which they live; but by articulating the emotions aroused by their observation of the world, they also serve as lenses through which to observe what’s happening in our lives—and therefore poets legislate, one could say, our spiritual and emotional drives and needs. I write to discover what I did not know, and sometimes what I’m afraid to know, about the human condition; that revelation may engender a deeper compassion or intensify the dread—there’s the apocalypse again!—but the act of writing, of articulating the unsaid and unseen, is liberating.

Girls On the Town, 1946

[Elvira H. D., 1924–2019]

You love a red lip. The dimples are extra currency, though you take care to keep powder from caking those charmed valleys. Mascara: check. Blush? Oh, yes.

And a hat is never wrong except evenings in the clubs: there a deeper ruby and smoldering eye will do the trick, with tiny embellishments—a ribbon or jewel, perhaps a flower—if one is feeling especially flirty or sad.

Until Rosie fired up her rivets, flaunting was a male prerogative; now, you and your girls have lacquered up and pinned on your tailfeathers, fit to sally forth and trample each plopped heart quivering at the tips of your patent-leather Mary Janes. This is the only power you hold onto, ripped from the dreams none of you believe are worth the telling. Instead of mumbling, why not decorate? Even in dim light how you glister, sloe-eyed, your smile in flames.

t a time in which bringing people together is necessarily limited, The Art of Gathering is a reminder of why it’s so important and how hosting groups can be done more effectively. A key aspect of my work at the Virginia Department of Housing and Community Development is facilitating productive community conversations. I read The Art of Gathering with colleagues focused on the potential that comes from having a diverse group of voices involved in public processes. The book reinforced why it’s important to carefully shape gatherings—from the venue and invitations to the tone established and questions framed. Locally, BOOK CITY★Roanoke has focused on the power of shared reading experiences to help us be better people and shape a stronger community. I’ve taken a few pages of notes from The Art of Gathering, and I can’t wait to meet again with neighbors and partners to discuss how thoughtfully convening our community can make us stronger—and then to get to work doing it!
behind the scenes

INSIDE THE ACQUISITIONS & ACCESS MANAGEMENT DEPARTMENT

Questions for Mary Clark, Director

How did you get into this line of work? What is your background?

Mary Clark: I have worked in libraries since high school. My first library job was as a book shelve in Norfolk, then after college I worked as a library assistant in Roanoke. I received my master of science degree in library science from the University of North Carolina–Chapel Hill, and joined the staff of the Library of Virginia in 1988. Since coming to here, I’ve worked in reference, government documents, and now as head of Acquisitions and Access Management.

What do you like about your job?

MC: I enjoy the variety of activities I do every day. I like managing the budget, collaborating with my colleagues, working with talented and dedicated catalogers and support staff, and helping to make our printed collections accessible for our users.

How have the Library’s collection goals changed over the last 10 or 20 years?

MC: The biggest difference in our collection practices now is the lack of focus on general reference materials. This is the area where the internet has influenced and affected the needs of our users. Twenty years ago, a large portion of our book budget was spent on hard copy directories, guides, fact books, etc. Now the biggest slice of the budget is spent on online research databases, scholarly and popular works of history, and especially Virginia-related printed materials including newspapers, local history, and Virginia authors.
What kinds of care do aging materials need?
MC: There are a variety of techniques for caring for aging and fragile books. Old, brittle, acidic paper is the most difficult to manage because there is little to do for it other than protecting it from further damage. Our practices include placing brittle books in a snug box, or placing the material between stiff acid-free boards and tying the boards together to protect the contents. For general wear and tear, we can mend pages, tighten book hinges, tip in missing pages, or rebind the material.

Have you worked with any particularly memorable items?
MC: We are lucky to work with both new and historic publications, including maps, sheet music, and rare books. It’s hard to pick one thing.

Is there anything that would surprise people about the work that you and your staff do?
MC: I think people might be surprised by how much work it actually takes to put a book to the shelf. We spend a lot of time selecting the right materials for our collection. Once a book is ordered and received, our catalogers take great pride in accurately describing the books in catalog records so that our users can find them, which is especially important in a closed-stack library like ours. The last step is physical processing, where we apply call number labels and protective covers to the books so that they can have a long, happy life on the shelf.

STAFF MEMBERS AT WORK
1. Documents and processing assistant Florence Sauls works with fragile historic materials.
2. Collection management coordinator Michael Bingham reviews online publishers’ catalogs for potential acquisitions.
3. Serials acquisition technician Maya Dynova handles some bound materials.
4. Acquisitions specialist Erica McCollum works with recent gift acquisitions. The team also includes catalogers Deanna Chavez, Dorothy Harrison, Carolyn Johnson, and Donna Pletcher, who are not pictured.

VOLUNTEER OPPORTUNITY
Making History with LVA
Place: Online
Registration required: bit.ly/LVAvirtualvolunteer
Crowdsource with us! Volunteers will transcribe handwritten pages and historical newspapers by reading text and typing it into digital form. Join us for a virtual session to learn how you can help make historical documents more searchable and usable for researchers now and in the future. April’s session will focus on “Virginia Untold: The African American Narrative.” Contact Sonya Coleman for more information at makinghistory@virginiamemory.com or call HandsOn Greater Richmond at 804.330.7400.

Common Ground Virginia History Book Group
Place: Online
Registration required: lva.virginia.gov/public/virginia_history_book_group
On the third Tuesday evening of each month, join a virtual book group discussion on compelling nonfiction books handpicked by Library staff members that explore Virginia history, society, and culture. April’s book is A Brave and Cunning Prince by James Horn. May’s book is The Devil’s Half Acre by Kristen Green. June’s book is The Appalachian Trail by Philip D’Anieri. For more information, contact Rebecca Schneider at rebecca.schneider@lva.virginia.gov or 804.692.3550.

Common Ground Virginia History Book Group
Place: Lecture Hall or Online
Registration required:
lva.virginia.gov/public/weinstein
Please join us in person for a talk by New York Times best-selling author and journalist Kristen Green on the inspiring true story of an enslaved woman who liberated an infamous slave jail and transformed it into one of the nation’s first Historically Black Colleges and Universities. A book signing will follow the talk. This in-person event will also be livestreamed on our Facebook and YouTube pages. For more information, contact Dawn Greggs at 804.692.3813 or dawn.greggs@lva.virginia.gov.

ALL EVENTS ARE FREE UNLESS OTHERWISE NOTED.
Indigenous communities across North America included people who identified as neither male nor female, but both. After European colonizers invaded Indian country, centuries of violence and systematic persecution followed, imperiling the existence of people who today call themselves Two-Spirits, an umbrella term denoting feminine and masculine qualities in one person. A book signing will follow the talk. For more information, contact Ashley Ramey Craig at ashley.ramey@lva.virginia.gov or 804.692.3001.

VIRGINIA HUMANITIES RESEARCH FELLOW TALK
Garden Clubs Make History: How Virginia’s Gardening Women Changed a State
Place: Lecture Hall
Join us in person for a talk by Meredith Henne Baker, who was a Virginia Humanities Research Fellow at the Library of Virginia last fall. Garden Week showcases garden club women’s preservation and beautification work. But what about the little-known ways club members transformed Virginia? Baker shares new stories about club women who advocated for conservation laws, tackled hunger, and successfully challenged the injustices of segregation. There’s no better time to remember that ordinary people can plant meaningful seeds of change. A question-and-answer session will follow the talk. Contact Elizabeth Klaczynski at elizabeth.klaczynski@lva.virginia.gov or 804.692.3536 for more information.

Thursday, May 12 | 6:00–7:30 PM
BOOK TALK WITH GERARD N. MAGLIOCCA
Washington’s Heir: The Life of Justice Bushrod Washington
Place: Lecture Hall
Join us for a talk by author and professor of law Gerard N. Magliocca on the first published biography of Bushrod Washington, the nephew of Founding Father George Washington and an attorney and politician who served on the Supreme Court of the United States. The author uses Washington’s journal to reveal new information on some of early America’s landmark constitutional cases, as well as examining his inheritance of both Mount Vernon and of the enslaved people of the Washington family. A book signing will follow the talk. Preservation Virginia presents a pre-talk reception at the John Marshall House (behind the Library of Virginia) at 4:30 pm, which requires registration. Contact Elizabeth Klaczynski at elizabeth.klaczynski@lva.virginia.gov or 804.692.3536 for more information.
WHAT'S BEEN HAPPENING AT THE LIBRARY
