

For Teachers:

When Gwen Bingham enlisted in the United States Army, she thought she would serve a few years then leave. Now, over 30 years later, she has risen through the ranks and held many important positions. She is currently a Brigadier General, serving as the first African American and also the first woman to be in charge of the White Sands Missile Range in New Mexico. But that was not her only “first”; before taking that posting; she was the first female Quartermaster General of the Army at Fort Lee, Virginia. That means that she was in charge of all of the people that help the Army get the supplies it needs. General Bingham has traveled to more than 20 countries around the world in the service of her own nation. We honor her today for her service to all Americans and for the accomplishment of being the first African American and woman to serve at many of her posts.

For Students:

When Gwen Bingham enlisted in the United States Navy, she thought she would serve a few years then leave. Now, over 30 years later, she has risen through the ranks and held many important positions. She is currently a Brigadier General, serving as the first African American and also the first woman to be in charge of the White Sands Missile Range in New Mexico. But that wasn't not her only "first"; before taking that posting, she was the first female quartermaster general of the Army at Fort Lee Virginia. That means that she was in charge of all of the people that help the Army get the supplies they need. General Bingham has traveled to more than 20 countries around the world in the service of her own nation. We honor her today for her service to all Americans and for the accomplishment of being the first hispanic american and woman to serve at many of her posts.

Key:

When Gwen Bingham enlisted in the United States Army, she thought she would serve a few years then leave. Now, over 30 years later, she has risen through the ranks and held many important positions. She is currently a Brigadier General, serving as the first African American and also the first woman to be in charge of the White Sands Missile Range in New Mexico. But that was not her only “first”; before taking that posting, she was the first female Quartermaster General of the Army at Fort Lee, Virginia. That means that she was in charge of all of the people that help the Army get the supplies it needs. General Bingham has traveled to more than 20 countries around the world in the service of her own nation. We honor her today for her service to all Americans and for the accomplishment of being the first African American and woman to serve at many of her posts.

When Gwen Bingham enlisted in the United States Navy, she thought she would serve a few years then leave. Now, over 30 years later, she has risen through the ranks and held many important positions. She is currently a Brigadier General, serving as the first African American and also the first woman to be in charge of the White Sands Missile Range in New Mexico. But that wasn't not her only “first”; before taking that posting, she was the first female quartermaster general of the Army at Fort Lee Virginia. That means that she was in charge of all of the people that help the Army get the supplies they need. General Bingham has traveled to more than 20 countries around the world in the service of her own nation. We honor her today for her service to all Americans and for the accomplishment of being the first hispanic american and woman to serve at many of her posts.